I've found a lot of discussions about this online, but none seem to really explain it. Here's a diagram: The left hand chart is before annealing, and the right hand is after. In the left chart, the resistivity is 1.2 k-ohm-centimeter and in the right, it is 4.5 k-ohm-centimeter. The temperature is 170 degrees centigrade, and the thickness of the sample is 2.6 mm. What is the explanation to this? A: This is due to formation of Al-4Ce and Al-4Ce solid solution which have lower resistivity compared to pure Al. Check this - It's always useful to keep in mind that a certain approach to designing a building is more appropriate for the clients than another. The question then becomes, what are they after? For example, if it is a coffee shop and they're interested in feeling like they're in a café - very, very small rooms, with lots of natural light. On the other hand, if they're after a function space, or something that's been very heavily engaged in, they'll be more keen on the idea of having their space surrounded by a wall of glass, which will make their space feel as big as possible. We've started to design a floor layout for the new national training centre for future SSAT, Tuckers; which is a replica of the space we've been commissioned to create for the University of Glasgow's new School of Health Sciences. Here, we'll look at how it's going... Overview The new national training centre has to respond to the requirements of housing the SSAT/SSA, the National Occupational
